NCCAkron Launches Year-Long, Virtual Residency Featuring Cohort of Black, Male Dancemakers

Dominic Moore-Dunson

AKRON, Ohio - The National Center for Choreography at The University of Akron (NCCAkron) is proud to announce Dancing Lab: BLKmenMOVES, a residency program centering the creative development of and networking among Black-identified, male choreographers.

Over the course of a year, the cohort from across the country will regularly convene virtually to establish a network of collegial support and critical feedback on each other's choreographic work. Residency participants include dancemakers Jean Appolon (Boston, MA); Kevin Lee-Y Green (Wilmington, NC); and Dominic Moore-Dunson (Akron, OH). Charles O. Anderson (Austin, TX), Founder/Artistic Director of the afro-contemporary company, Dance Theatre X, will serve as the program's facilitator and artist mentor.

NCCAkron's Dancing Labs are process-oriented laboratory environments where dance artists come together to collaboratively explore shared concepts and questions. Participating artists are encouraged to use their time together to experiment with ideas and movement without a final product in mind. Dancing Labs are often described as a half-step towards whatever is next with much needed resources like time, space, and financial support to further each person's individual creative growth.

The initial idea for Dancing Lab: BLKmenMOVES actually emerged in 2019 through a series of conversations between NCCAkron Executive/Artistic Director Christy Bolingbroke and the late choreographer, director, and professor Marcus White. The two met while serving as panel advisors for New England Foundation for the Arts' National Dance Project: one of the nation's largest grantmaking initiatives for dancemakers. During the panel review process, the two recognized a growing need for choreographers of color, particularly Black men:

Bolingbroke recalled, "In viewing work and submissions by artists like Jean [Appolon] and Kevin [Green], they each articulated what it is like to operate outside of densely populated dance communities like New York City or San Francisco, and what it is to be one of few or sometimes the only Black choreographers in their immediate community. Through NCCAkron's work with the Knight Foundation and other Knight Resident City artists (of which White called Detroit one of his homes), Marcus [White] and I were also reminded of Dominic [Moore-Dunson] in Akron and began to envision how such a cohort might connect with each other."

The original plan had been for the cohort to visit each artist's community for a couple days every couple of months over the course of a year. COVID has obviously limited such travel to happen, but the conversations and meet-ups will continue to happen virtually. Tragically, Marcus White passed away suddenly in May 2020, just one week after first meeting with all three artists. Anderson, a friend and colleague of Mr. White, graciously stepped in to facilitate the cohort in his honor and offered these thoughts moving the initiative forward, "While there is no way to fill the shoes of Marcus, I am deeply honored and inspired to be a part of this program. One of the ways he and I deeply connected was around the commitment to create and hold space for diverse Black male voices in contemporary performance. We have the opportunity to support one another in our respective work and to collectively strategize upon ways to continue to build upon an often underserved and under-recognized legacy in concert dance."

Continuing the support for these choreographers even more urgently as the racial justice movement advances as well as in White's honor, Bolingbroke shares these questions from Marcus White in their final correspondence:

Does all of "the work" - the research, the dance, the writing, the conversations around it - always have to be bound by race? And on the flipside, how can we make something not bound by race?

This iteration of Dancing Lab: BLKmenMOVES will take place between now and July 2021.
